Yes mummy?

Step away from the mains.

Yes mummy.

Father carved the teeth of the comb over many moons, under dappling leaves.

Dinner Mother called. Father turned too carefully to acknowledge.

His foot stepped on the comb and it broke. He wrapped it in a leaf and hid it under the moon.

Come Star-light, took the well-worn comb,
gently snapping the box tight,
Father combed mother's hair und sight,

Emperor's day paraded down the grand avenue, banners sparkling in the blazing horns.

Soldiers marched in rank and file.

Generals and commanders shone in honors.

She pointed at the medal hanging on the admiral's lapel.

Bobo ran among the crowded feet, so that an old woman in rich dress fell into the marching path, squeaming.

In the confusion and ensued, he nicked the shiny medal.

Opening his hand, he shewed her.

Imperial press minted the new orders on cheap paper.

Herald boys passed the pamphlets so they fluttered through the gutters.

Mu ate them.

She visited the Temple on Spring Cleaning.

She looked around in amazement and wonder and some apprehension at the roiling crowds.

Briefly, she ran into an old man carrying a basket of fruit, presumably for his wife before him.

He ignored her apology, or made to.

She hid herself in a hollow, and held her breath.

The suneractuical resersuration of mything Rebe, consatenly tof atatreal in an state of search.

Bobo came and went and again searched.

Suprise! she hollered.

Bobo berated her. She apologised.

She found him a sweet cherry.

The day the Temple burned few could remember.

She hid herself in the deepest crypt, her only companion an urn.

She cradled it and whispered nothings through its lid.

Before she left, she slipped a Ribbon in gratitude.

Court Physician spelled out the imperial orders for changing a candle wick.

And for bottling vinegar.

As well as correct application of perfume.

Only lamps were wicked.

Vinegar came in skins.

And no one cared to smell.

When Uncle came to visit, he brought with him butterflies tied with string.

Every time Bobo turned a trick, he let one loose.

Every time Father served him tea, he let one loose.

Every time mother rere recece

Every time Mother recited a poem, he let two loose.

For Two-Ribbons? He tied one to each Ribbon just before he left.

That's right.

They sat at the sheet laid before the Fortune Teller and he clattered the characters from his bag.

Long manicured nails swept breezingly over the heiroglyphs.

He ho-ed and hum-ed.

She will be sent to the sild factory.

At first she gasped.

She then ignored him because she would not be fishing threads from worms.

She picked a sea-shell from the sheet.

How much is this conch?

The birds flew from the canopies and fluttered over the stream.

The goldfish whirled and swirled in the pool.

The insects and bees and squirrels and all manner of critters fled up the trunks.

BOOM.

The ground shook.

She hold her breath.

She held her breath.

When she let it out, it rained.
